CHICAGO – On Monday, September 26, 2016, Hubbard Street Dance Chicago was honored to welcome Lin-Manuel Miranda, creator and original star of Hamilton: An American Musical, to its West Loop facility, the Hubbard Street Dance Center, located at 1147 West Jackson Boulevard. More than 160 invited guests included students and families participating in Hubbard Street’s Youth Dance Programs; members of Hubbard Street’s Junior Ensemble, Hubbard Street 2 and the artists of its world-renowned main company; staff members and special guests; individual and foundation supporters of its Education Programs; and Season 38 Spotlight Ball attendees who made donations at the organization’s annual gala.

Sara Albrecht, Chair of Hubbard Street’s Board of Directors, welcomed everyone to Studio A, “one of our eight studios, which house our dancers, our Youth Dance Programs, our nationally recognized Parkinson’s Project and The Autism Project, and the Lou Conte Dance Studio,” she said. “Thanks to your generosity at our gala, we can continue to grow these important programs, both here and in Chicago Public Schools.”

“For some of you here tonight, the connection between Lin-Manuel Miranda and Hubbard Street might not be entirely clear,” added Suzanne Appel, Hubbard Street’s Director of External Affairs and host for the evening’s conversation. “But we’re hoping to illuminate that for you tonight, in discussing arts education and how dance changes lives.”

“The impact of arts education on my career is complete and total, and it saved my life,” Lin-Manuel Miranda confirmed. Recounting his first experiences in musical theater with teachers Barbara Ames and Robert Sherman at Hunter Elementary School in New York City, Miranda recalled the many roles he played in a marathon, student-led sixth-grade production borrowing characters and songs from classic shows such as Bye Bye Birdie, Fiddler on the Roof and Peter Pan. “I played Conrad Birdie, a cowhand in Oklahoma!, a son in Fiddler, Captain Hook, Bernardo in West Side Story — natch — and an Addaperle backup in the Wizard of Oz—slash—The Wiz,” Miranda explained. “This is a very lethal dose of musical theater at a very young age,” he observed, “and I thought, I am doing this for the rest of my life, if they will let me.”
“I hope that there are many young people who Hubbard Street reaches,” replied Appel, “for whom their dance experiences are also setting them up, either for lives as artists, or for however else they decide to use what they’ve learned through dance.”

Additional subjects and topics covered during the course of Appel and Miranda’s one-hour conversation included:

- Community engagement during the Chicago run of Hamilton: An American Musical, about which Miranda noted: “As soon as Hamilton opened at the Public [Theater in New York City], the question after the show was always, ‘How are you gonna get more kids here? How are you gonna get more kids here?’ So we began planning for that very early, and we partnered with the Rockefeller Foundation and the Gilder Lehrman Institute [of American History], to create this program we call #EduHam.” Through discounted ticket offers and dedicated student matinées, “which are the best shows that we do,” added Miranda, “20,000 eleventh-grade students studying U.S. history will see Hamilton this year.” Until now only available to students in New York City–area schools, the #EduHam program will be duplicated for Chicago, said Miranda, “and we’re finding our local partners in your schools as we speak. As long as Hamilton is on tour in a town, there will be a bunch of students seeing the show in that town.”

- Miranda’s personal history with and experiences in dance, which began with “Puerto Rican Dance Training 101,” he explained, “which is my father, Luis Miranda, telling me, ‘You’re gonna learn to salsa, or you’re gonna get out of the house.’” During his years in high school, “While everyone was playing racquetball and football, I was doing the foxtrot and dosi-do. I was one of three boys in the [social dance] class, thinking, Why is anyone doing anything else? This is awesome!” While attending Wesleyan University, where Miranda and Appel first met as undergraduates, “I took Ballet 1 and Ballet 2 with [Patricia L. Beaman]...I was always taking dance classes concurrently with everything else I was doing.” Miranda spoke appreciatively of the “mind-altering experience” working with acclaimed choreographers Andy Blankenbuehler and Luis Salgado on his first Broadway musical, In the Heights, and subsequent projects.

- Writing characters for the stage and his creative process, about which Miranda explained, “I don’t know any other way to write except to give every character I’m writing every bit of humanity that I have, and to find my way in. It has to be as honest as possible, because I don’t know how to write mustache-twirling bad guys — you won’t find them in my work. They’ve always got their reasons, even if they’re messing up, or even if they’re doing something that hurts others.”

During the question-and-answer session which concluded the evening, Hubbard Street Dancer Alicia Delgadillo asked Miranda, “If resources and time were limitless, what would you be doing right now?”

“I need time to be finite,” Miranda responded. “I need finite resources. Restrictions help you be creative, as anyone who’s good at chess will tell you, as anyone who’s written a haiku or a sonnet will tell you. The form unlocks the work.”
